Title: The spirit of medical Transcription

Medical Transcriptionists are very special people. We are workers who sign our initials on each finished product, we are crafts persons in a modern age. We are practitioners of communication, we are the magicians of medical terminology, the masters of grammar and punctuation, and are expertise close through related areas such as Pharmacology and sophisticated new instruments from the operating room.

We are in a key position as member of the healthcare team. We break the sound barrier everyday. We are the trained ears to create sense out of many diverse accents. And sometimes just play nonsense. We have a surgical precision on our own, a knife like with a time, and our own scalper sharp intelligence. We have that attention to detail thats sparkle, that scintillating compulsion to look things up, did the patient see a Neurologist or a Urologist. We look it up in the patient's chart. What is the patient's middle Initial, Proper name, zip code, area code, there are crazy days when every second word is a spelling nightmare like pipe sitter, Albaquerque, quanted heart, vis a vis, hand me the dictionary please, everyday is like a treasure hunt in an ocean of words, education, books, words, we want to know everything. We also have sensitivity, humour, a sense of responsibility and ethics and most importantly we have excellence. We are professionals, serving the Healthcare customer, the patient.

Medical Transcriptionists know more about the patient than anyone else except the position. We wait through galons of urinalysis on rivers of blood samples and we know the chemical state of patients as well as the most intimidate details of their social history. Marching across our view each day are life and death, struggle with disease, social problems, and sometimes thank goodness human comedy. When we transcribe a birth record we breathe a sigh on ' Welcome On board' to the new arrival. When at discharge summary becomes a death summary often we are saddened no matter how old the patient. We have heard it all and transcribe it all. The blood, the pain, the surprising recovery, the agonizing losses, the inexplicable reversals. The courage, the toughness, the incredible human body's ability to take punishment, from the blood test to the barrier minima from chemotherapy to colostomy. We see the whole picture from the incomprehensive patient names to patients from strange sounding places, geopolitical smudges on maps we never go instead until recently.

Why do we care, why does magnificent mania for learning an excellence. One reason is that we have sympathy for the sick, for the elderly, for the patient who cannot speak English, for everyone put on hold too often and too long and force to listen to Kent Tenny music, what everyone disconnected, bullied or intimidated by the healthcare system, for everyone who relies on us to accurately record and preserve the medical record for everyone, for every patient.

One of the hallmarks of Medical Transcriptionists is our willingness to share like the great cooks of the world who share their recipes, we try to help the newcomer the student and each other with the tricks of the trade, whenever medical transcriptionists get together to talk about our work we often mention that rhythm, that perfect blend of a great physician's voice, equipment without sticky keys and broken pedals and headsets without snaps and crackles. Those times when you know every word you hear when every spelling is in your head or at your fingertips in a reference source, you wizz along with no mistakes getting that upbeat feeling that rhythm, we do not tapped dance, we do not break dance but we do a dictate dance, we record every last syllable and we do a correct way Siren partners in a never ending minuaved of dictator in transcriptionist end of dictation.
